

In this edition:

1. Your guide to keeping college affordable
2. Coming attractions for the 2023-2024 school year

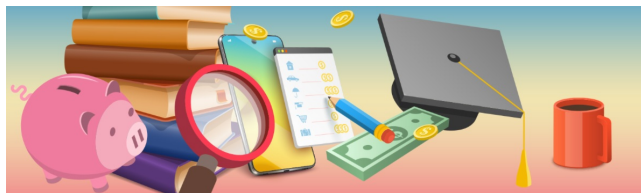

Insights and info from College Money Matters – a non-profit organization dedicated to helping high school students and their families make informed decisions about applying, choosing and paying for college.

Your guide to keeping college affordable

With the current level of U.S. student debt already at 1.7 trillion dollars, it's vitally important for this generation of students to learn how to pay for college without taking on crushing levels of debt. That's what College Money Matters is all about.

Throughout the year, our non-profit organization provides college-bound students and their families with the information they need to make good decisions about applying, choosing and paying for college. We accomplish that through our popular website, www.collegemoneymatters.org, ongoing communications with school counselors and advisors, and online publications like this newsletter.

Coming attractions for the 2023-2024 school year

Subscribe to our newsletter, and you'll receive regular and timely updates on topics that concern college-bound students throughout the school year – with enough advance notice to do something about them. Among the subjects we'll cover are:

How many schools to apply to	How to read your financial aid package
Good questions to ask when visiting schools	How your planned career can impact which school you choose
Filling out the FAFSA	Parent PLUS loans and other financial matters for parents
Understanding student loans	Applying for scholarships and grants

No interest but yours

Our website, collegemoneymatters.org, is a completely free online resource with no ads, no agenda, and strict privacy protection for the more than 1,500 students, parents and counselors who visit us every week. Visit the site, and you'll see how seemingly complicated college-related issues can be transformed into articles, videos and games that are simple, clear and even fun.

College Money Matters' mission is to provide free and easy-to-understand information about paying for college to students and their families. We do not take advertisements or sell user information. We are unaffiliated and are not selling any products or services. College Money Matters and its website, collegemoneymatters.org, rely on contributions and grants so that we are not beholden to private lenders, universities or other interested parties.

Your contribution will help more families take a more affordable approach to college.

Click here to donate now.

